NEAL S. BLAISDELL CONCERT HALL
We all know the story, the tale of two young lovers from feuding families… a feud that ultimately results in the senseless deaths of so many. Over the centuries it has spoken to every generation since its creation… it endures because it resonates within each of us, stroking the strings that recall the first heart-pounding moment of 16-year-old love. When we were certain that no one had ever felt this way… when we were certain that love could not be denied or broken.

When Gounod was writing this opera, he wrote to his wife, telling her that he felt twenty years younger because he had become so involved and connected to the two young lovers. He found their story to be buoying and inspirational and went on to write the entire work in three months time. His score is full of youthful abandon, perfectly capturing that joyful blush of first love.

Romeo et Juliette is also the story of the tragic fruit of unending hate. In Shakespeare’s tale, bitter anger has been passed down in two families over generations. Lost are the reasons for the discord, but time has not diminished the controversy, but has only deeply worn the patterns of destructive behavior. This blinding fury sets into motion actions that are irrevocable and disastrous.

Like so many conflicts large and small in the world today, the genesis of anger is often inexplicable and hate simply becomes a force of its own… a way of moving through existence that is utterly reactionary and volatile. And, just like the story of our two lovers, ironically only tragedy can break the cycle of hatred. The Capulets and Montagues only agree to let past injuries go as they each face the loss of their beloved children. They find common ground in the ruin and loss that each family must now suffer.

Romeo et Juliette is a one of the greatest love stories of all time. It is also a story of hope, of loss, and redemption. Let the score transport you to an earlier time, a time when you first felt your heart skip and your face flush from the sheer delight of being close to someone. Let it also remind us that finding all-important common ground should be a goal, hopefully not motivated by loss but by the pursuit of preventing it.
Sometimes, home is just a feeling.
Take three, last day of shooting. Paris.

The Story of Romeo & Juliet

Gounod's opera closely follows Shakespeare's work. Most of the libretto's deviations from the play serve to condense the story and heighten the musical drama. The setting: Verona, 14th century.

The opera opens on the Capulet's masked ball (Shakespeare's fifth scene). Among the guests is Romeo, who, upon seeing Juliette, the daughter of Lord Capulet, falls madly in love. Juliette, however, has been betrothed (without her knowledge) to the Count Paris. When told of her impending marriage she wants no part of it, but moments later, having met Romeo, she finds love. Juliette's cousin Tybalt believes that the masked stranger who has caught her attention is a Montague, sworn enemies of the Capulets, but is restrained and is powerless to prove it.

The balcony scene unfolds much as it does in Shakespeare's work. Juliette proposes marriage to Romeo who agrees, and the couple is twice interrupted, finishing the scene with the familiar lines, "parting is such sweet sorrow."

Having decided to marry, the lovers come to the cell of Friar Lawrence, intent on exchanging vows in a secret ceremony. Believing that the marriage might end the two families' bitter feud, the Friar agrees and the young lovers are married. After the wedding, a non-Shakespearian character appears, the page Stephano. The young Stephano has insulted the Capulets, and a fight erupts between the two families. Tybalt challenges Romeo, who having just married into the family, refuses to fight. Another Montague, Mercutio, takes up the challenge and is quickly slain. No longer able to restrain himself, Romeo attacks Tybalt, killing him. Lord Capulet arrives with the Duke of Verona. The Duke banishes Romeo from the town and from his beloved Juliette.

The young lovers spend their wedding night together, knowing Romeo will be forced into exile. He has been warned that if he is found within the town's walls, he will pay with his life. Romeo departs just as dawn breaks. Juliette's father arrives and tells her that she must marry Count Paris immediately. She seeks advice from Friar Lawrence, who produces a potion and a plan. The potion will make Juliette appear to be dead for forty-two hours, and in that time, the Friar will return with Romeo. She promptly drinks. Lord Capulet returns to urge her to marry, and Juliette protests, claiming death a more attractive option. The potion has begun to work, and she falls to the floor, seemingly dead.

Juliette is placed in the family crypt. Through a series of miscommunications, Romeo believes her to be dead, and steals into her tomb. In his anguish, he drinks poison; a moment later Juliette awakens. Romeo is ecstatic to learn that Juliette is alive. But the poison begins to take effect and Romeo tells Juliette what he has done. Juliette seizes a dagger and mortally wounds herself, and the lovers die in each other's arms.

2008 Summer Season

a Little Night Music

by Stephen Sondheim

Entwine in Shakespeare's Musical Tale

"One cannot trifle with love. [...] Juliette has entwined me with the famous silk thread meant to capture Romeo," wrote Gounod while composing Roméo et Juliette for Léon Carvalho’s Théâtre-Lyrique in 1865. But Gounod may have been under the spell of Shakespeare’s play ever since 1839 when he heard Berlioz’s dramatic symphony on this subject. Like Berlioz, he opens with a choral prelude narrating Shakespeare’s tragedy and has a brilliantly orchestrated number for Mercutio’s Queen Mab speech. Gounod also described his act-endings in terms that evoke a symphonic aesthetic: Act 1 "brilliant"; Act 2 "tender and dream-like"; Act 3 "animated and grand with its duels and the sentence of exile for Romeo"; Act 4 "dramatic"; and Act 5 "tragic." At the same time, however, Roméo includes set pieces designed to appeal to the French opera-going public of the Second Empire.

Gounod’s librettists, Jules Barbier and Michel Carré, focus more on the central couple than does Shakespeare and whittle away the political background of the Capulet-Montague feud. Juliette also awakens before Romeo has died, permitting the last of four duets that stand at the core of this work. Highlighting the young lovers’ story from their first meeting to the tomb allows Gounod to showcase melody, his strongest gift.

Roméo et Juliette was a huge success from the time of its premiere on 27 April 1867 during the Exposition universelle. Gounod had wanted spoken dialogue between the musical numbers, but bowed to pressure by his publisher for a completely sung, exportable version. Late in rehearsals he accommodated Caroline Miolan-Carvalho with a valse-ariette (Je veux vivre Act 1), a vehicle for her brilliant technique, but Juliette’s superb grand air in Act 4 (Amour ranime mon courage), too dramatic for Miolan-Carvalho’s light voice, was not performed at the premiere.

Despite its success, Roméo et Juliette has been revised or cut repeatedly. For the revival at the Opera-Comique in 1873, Gounod himself altered the finales of Acts 1 and 3. For the Opéra in 1888, he added a chorus on Romeo’s memorable phrase "Ah, jour de deuil" in Act 3 and a ballet for Act 4. The four duets of Romeo and Juliette have not undergone such revision, and they mark the nodal points of the drama.

When they meet in Act 1 the young protagonists use the precious language of the madrigal, sometimes taken word for word from Shakespeare. With a minuet-like rhythm, Gounod underlines the formality of their dialogue. At the end of the brief piece, the two duet for the first time, symbolizing that they have become one soul. Before the balcony scene in Act 2, we hear Romeo’s memorable Italianate cavatina (Ah! lève-toi soleil). In a duet of tender passion Juliette agrees to marry Romeo, and the two part reluctantly in a restrained cabaletta. At the climax of the opera in Act 4 a sensuous prelude opening with four cellos expresses the rapture of the couple after their wedding night. They sing much of their Andante in mellifluous parallel sixths. Later Juliette tries repeatedly to deny that the morning lark is announcing the end of their time together, rising in pitch as she tries to extend the night. Finally in the last act the two are alone and uninterrupted after Juliette awakens. Extensive thematic recall heightens the poignancy of the scene. They ask for divine clemency as they die, and a motif from their love theme, now transcendant, sounds in the orchestra.

With four superb duets and a well-paced score, Gounod never "trifles" with his affection for Shakespeare’s young lovers, but he does thoroughly entwine us in their tale with some of his finest music.
